

How can i hide app in my phone

Continue

One our worst fears in a relationship is probably the prospect of our partner cheating on us. It's one of the hardest things to get passed and if you are suspicious of them, it's even more difficult to face them. Something that makes all of this even harder is knowing if they're actually cheating on you or not. Is my partner cheating? There are many ways to know if you're being cheated on. One thing you have to remember, however, is that some of these signs can mean a lot of different things. Ultimately, you would have to catch them cheating to know for sure. But these are definitely signs that something is off and your partner could be cheating. They're shielding their phone from you. Since we communicate the most through our phones, it's only likely that if they're cheating, they'll be texting the other person and even calling them. If your partner is hiding their phone from you whenever they get a message or a call, it's a sign they're cheating. They're working longer hours. Now, this could be a completely legitimate reason for them staying longer at work. However, if you call their office and they're not there when they said they'd be, it's a good possibility they're using "working late" as a way for you to not be suspicious if they're off with the other person. They're being vague about where they're going. Most significant others will give specific details about what they're doing and when. You usually know if they're going to the store, to a friends, or off to the bar. If your partner is suddenly being very vague about their whereabouts, it's possible they're cheating. They have a new "friend". If they start talking about this new friend in their life but won't really give you a name or allow you to meet them, it could be their new lover. Many people even give their new person a different name so you won't get suspicious. They're acting distant toward you. If you feel as though you're being pushed away from them and they're putting distance between you, they could be cheating. Even though people cheat, they still feel guilty about it and therefore, they'll avoid you in order to feel less guilty about the affair. Just be sure they're not really busy or distracted with other stressful endeavors. They've changed their everyday behavior. Most people have a routine and they stick with this routine. You get to know what they do every day and how they act throughout the day. If this behavior changes abruptly with seemingly no reason, it could be because they're cheating on you. When they start texting you during different times or going somewhere when they usually just sat at home, it's a sign they're seeing someone else behind your back. They use apps to conceal their phone information. There are a number of different apps developed for cheaters. Unfortunately, these apps help hide the fact that you're cheating from your partner. There are a lot of different kinds that have different features but ultimately, if you see cheating apps on their phone, you know what it means. Apps That Hide Text Messages and Phone Calls One huge sign your partner is cheating is if they use any of these apps. They have the ability to hide their texting information and even phone calls. If you see these apps on their phone, be prepared for the worse. Hide My Calls/Text - Baseball This app is a decoy app. It looks just like a baseball game but it's actually a separate app that allows someone to converse with another person in secret. If your significant other has an android phone and they have this app on it, don't be fooled with the way it looks. It's actually an app that deletes and blocks text and phone calls from your viewing. This is another app for androids that conceals your texts and calls from anyone else. A person can use this for up to 5 people and it's almost impossible to see. The app itself is invisible on the screen and only open after tapping the bottom of it. Beware of this app and make sure to test if it's there. When you tap the bottom of the black screen, a red box will appear and that's how you enter the app. This app is available in both iOS and Android. It's different than the other two apps because it doesn't hide texts or phone calls, but it actually gives you a completely different way of communicating with someone. It even deletes your conversation after a certain amount of time. Beware if your partner has this. CoverMe Private Calls Secret Text Message Hide App This is another app that's used to hide text messages. You can decide what you want hidden so you can have private conversations that get locked away. If your significant other has this app on their phone, they're definitely cheating on you. What to do if They're Cheating Knowing what to do when you catch someone cheating is never easy. The best thing for you to do is confront them. Talk about your concerns and that you're suspicious of their cheating. If they completely deny it and you have proof, show them and ask for an explanation. In most cases, they won't have one and they'll fess up to the cheating. However, never forgive them. Cheating destroys your trust and when you can't trust someone, you can't possibly build a healthy relationship with them anymore. If they have apps on their phone that suggests they're cheating, ask them to explain what they are if they deny cheating on you. All in all, you may have to prepare for the worst and leave the person who's cheating on you. Cheaters are the worst type of people out there and it's sad that there are also so many apps to help a person cheat. Knowing the signs of a cheater and the apps they may be using can help save you from heartache. Hide photos, videos, music and apps on your phone Access the hidden data with your fingerprint Lock other apps with fingerprint or password to prevent others from opening them Your data is encrypted and safely stored on your device Create private notes on your phone Browse the web privately with inbuilt private browser with ad-blocking and tracking protection Chat and exchange photos with your loved ones in privacy with inbuilt chat app Super Fast support system, available 24x7 for your help Lewis Tse Pui Lung/Shutterstock.com. It's the year 2019, and everyone willingly carries a tracking device in their pockets. People can have their precise locations tracked in real time by the government, advertising companies, and even rogue bounty hunters. It sounds like dystopian fiction—but it's a reality. We like debunking sensationalist stories, but this latest controversy is true. Your phone's precise location can be tracked in several different ways. How Rogue Bounty Hunters Can Track Your Location Flemingn/Shutterstock.com. The latest controversy was touched off by Joseph Cox over at Motherboard, who gave a bounty hunter $300 and a phone number. That bounty hunter managed to find the precise, current location of the cellular phone associated with that phone number, down to a few hundred meters. Wait, slow down: How? Well, apparently AT&T, Sprint, and T-Mobile all sell data—including geographic locations associated with customer phone numbers—to a variety of sketchy third-party companies. This data might be used by the bail bond industry to track people down, for example. But there's not much oversight, and rogue bounty hunters have access to the data. "People are reselling to the wrong people," a source in the bail industry told Motherboard. Here's the sad thing: This isn't even a new problem! The New York Times reported that this could happen back in May 2018. Cellular carriers promised to do better. For example, T-Mobile CEO John Legere promised to not "sell customer location data to shady middleman" in response to the New York Times Story back in June 2018 The good news is that AT&T, Sprint, and T-Mobile have all promised to stop selling this data to aggregators in response to Motherboard's January 2019 story. And it seems like Verizon already stopped after the earlier New York Times story. What You Can Do About It: Hope carriers stop selling your data to shady intermediaries this time, as promised. How the Government Can Track Your Location Michal Kalasek/Shutterstock.com. It's worth emphasizing that the government itself can still get access to your location data from your cellular company. They just need to get a warrant, and they can serve that to your cellular service provider. The cellular provider can then provide your location to the government, even going so far as to provide real-time updates. (And yes, the US Supreme Court has ruled that police need a warrant to get this information!) That all makes perfect sense. Of course, if the technology exists, the government can get access to it with a warrant. But it is quite a change from decades ago when the government had no way to track people's real-time locations with a device that's nearly always in their pockets. The government doesn't even need to get your cellular company involved. There are other tricks they can use to pinpoint your location with even better accuracy, such as by deploying stingray devices near you. These impersonate nearby cellular towers, forcing your phone to connect to them. (More US courts are ruling that police need a warrant for this type of tracking, too.) What You Can Do About It: Nothing unless you want to stop carrying a phone. How Advertisers Can Track Your Location Vasin Lee/Shutterstock.com. It's not just your cellular carrier. Even if your cellular carrier perfectly safeguarded your data, it'd probably be very easy to track you thanks to the location access you've given to apps installed on your smartphone. Weather apps are particularly bad. You install a weather app and give it access to your location—after all, it needs your location to show you the weather. That's all true and above board. But, hold on: That weather app is also selling your data to the highest bidder. After all, you probably didn't pay money for your weather app, so it has to make money somehow! The city of Los Angeles is suing the Weather Channel, saying that its app intrusively mines and sells its users' location data. AccuWeather was caught sending its users' location data to a third-party advertiser back in 2017, too—even after updating the app to remove that feature, after it was first reported! This is a pattern for weather apps in particular. It's possible people could use this data to find weather app users' precise locations. Dark Sky promises it won't abuse your location data and we like Dark Sky. But Dark Sky can only afford to do that because it charges money for its weather app up-front. Weather apps are just one example, and all kinds of apps that request access to your location probably sell it in some way. Rogue bounty hunters can probably start getting location data from these kinds of apps rather than from cellular carriers in the future. What You Can Do About It: Avoid giving third-party apps access to your location. As Motherboard recommends, stop using third-party weather apps and use your phone's built-in weather app. (Here's how to manage app permissions on your iPhone or Android phone.) Many weather apps also let you enter a Zip code or city name for the cities you want to track, which is at least better than sharing your location data. How Your Family Can Track Your Location blackheep/Shutterstock.com. Your phone is capable of determining its location and sharing it in the background, even if the screen is off. You don't need to have an app open. You can see this yourself if you use a service like Apple's Find My Friends, which is included on iPhones. Find My Friends can be used to share your precise real-time locations with family members or friends. After you give someone access, they can open the app, and Apple's servers will ping your iPhone, get your location, and show it to them. It's a convenient way to see whether your partner is on the way home from work yet or find your friends in a crowd. Android phones have something similar in a Google app called Trusted Contacts, and of course, there are many third-party apps that help you share your real-time locations with people. Of course, this is only with your permission, but it just shows how pervasive this technology is. After all, it's the same technology you can use to remotely track your lost iPhone or Android phone in case you lose it. But it's accessible to any app that asks for access to your location in the background. What You Can Do About It: Be careful about who you share your real-time location with.
